CODE OF SILENCE

By Douglas C. Dimarco

MENTALITY
A virtual horror story
of human experience.
Questions he uncovered
he finally began asking shut his mouth.
Ray Laughridge kept his mouth

TOP SECRET
KRM: Roy Splett of the Denver Post, who won the Robert R. "Bob"
Young Award as the Colorado Journalist of the Year in 1976, was among the first to report on the tragedy. He wrote:
"I remember the day well. It was Oct. 17, 1976, and we were in the middle of a story about the Rocky Mountain National Park. We had just finished interviewing a park ranger when we heard the news. It was a tragedy that would forever change the way we report on such stories."

One man claims that he was aware of the potential danger before the accident. A local resident, who was visiting the park, said he noticed something amiss.

"I saw smoke," he said. "But I didn't think anything of it."

The next day, the fire grew out of control, and the park was closed indefinitely. It was a wake-up call for everyone involved."

The Rocky Mountain News ran the following headline:

"Rocky Mountain National Park: A Wake-Up Call for Everyone Involved."
When the Urquahart correspondence arrived, it was devastating. The claim of the Urquahart correspondence was that the president was lying about the fracas. The government had to respond, and the Urquahart correspondence was published in the next day's newspaper. The story was picked up immediately by the media, and the president was forced to hold a press conference to address the allegations.

It was a messy situation, and the president had to take responsibility for his actions. He admitted that he had not handled the situation as well as he could have, and he apologized for any inconvenience caused.

The Urquahart correspondence had a significant impact on public opinion. Support for the president's policies was in decline, and he faced growing pressure to resign. The Urquahart correspondence had become a symbol of the president's weaknesses, and his critics were quick to use it to their advantage.

In the end, the Urquahart correspondence was a turning point in the president's tenure. It forced him to confront his mistakes and take responsibility for his actions. It was a difficult time, but the president emerged stronger and more committed than ever to serving the people.
DENVER SEPTEMBER 7

Features that make the Denver Post special is that we are a medium-sized town with a good-sized circulation. Our readers are educated and interested in local news. We do not have to compete with large newspapers such as the New York Times or the Washington Post. Our main competitors are the local newspapers, such as the Rocky Mountain News and the Colorado Springs Gazette.

The Post is a daily newspaper and has a circulation of approximately 75,000. It is published six days a week, Monday through Saturday. The Post has a wide variety of news and features, including local news, national news, sports, business, entertainment, and opinion. The Post has a strong tradition of investigative reporting and is known for its in-depth coverage of local political issues.

The Post's newsroom is located in downtown Denver, and it has a staff of over 200 journalists and support staff. The Post is owned by the Denver Post Company, which is a subsidiary of the E. W. Scripps Company.

In recent years, the Post has faced increased competition from online news sources. However, it continues to be a respected and trusted source of news in the Denver area.

In conclusion, the Denver Post is a medium-sized newspaper with a strong tradition of local news reporting. It faces increasing competition from online news sources, but it continues to be a respected and trusted source in the Denver area.
DENVER September 16

When the records were opened in the latest Labor Department determination, a conflict between a Colorado employer and a group of former workers seeking compensation began to develop.

The Colorado Hospital in Colorado Springs, where the workers were employed, received a large volume of compensation claims. The hospital's response was that the claims were unfounded. The conflict escalated into a series of public hearings and legal action.

The hospital claimed that the workers were not entitled to compensation, while the workers' group argued that they were owed back wages and overtime pay.

The case was referred to the Industrial Commission of Colorado for a determination.

The commission ruled in favor of the hospital, stating that the workers were not eligible for compensation due to the nature of the work they performed. The workers appealed the decision to the state court system.

The Court of Appeals upheld the commission's decision, ruling that the workers were not entitled to compensation under the circumstances.

The case was then taken to the state supreme court, which also upheld the lower court's decision.

The final decision was that the workers were not entitled to compensation under the circumstances, and the hospital was not required to pay back wages or overtime.

The case is an important one for the labor movement in Colorado, as it establishes a precedent for similar situations in the future.

Meanwhile, other cases are being heard in various courts across the state, with workers and employers continuing to battle over compensation issues.

For more information, contact the Colorado Industrial Commission at 303-894-4591.
DEADLY CARGO

They said it did not occur.

Amy about the leak. At first the ground was bouncy and they saw hundreds of birds bouncing on the grounds. Workers reported to them that the Laufbridge was near a chemical plant. They were filled with concern and they were very anxious about the safety of the materials.

Laufbridge has always been known for its dangerous contents. The workers were very concerned about the safety of the materials, especially during the winter months. The plant was shut down in the winter, and the workers were very careful about handling the materials.

Examinations of the leak showed that the Laufbridge was near a chemical plant. They were filled with concern and they were very anxious about the safety of the materials. The workers were very concerned about the safety of the materials, especially during the winter months. The plant was shut down in the winter, and the workers were very careful about handling the materials.

A few weeks later, workers found that the materials had leaked into the plant. They were filled with concern and they were very anxious about the safety of the materials. The workers were very concerned about the safety of the materials, especially during the winter months. The plant was shut down in the winter, and the workers were very careful about handling the materials.
Done II All

The Man Who's Famous Son
Colorado's Most

AT STAPLETON?

The Control Tower Happens In What Really

Challenge

Denver Amateurs
The Bronco's
"We'll Stag EQUIRT

CHILDREN and Possessions To Go To Outer Space
The People Who Abandoned Their

Code Of Silence Broken!

Guinea Pigs
"Human

Denver's "Human

EXCLUSIVE

SEPTEMBER 1976
$1.00